Knife Maintenance

I think we all get a little giddy using a brand new, out of the box knife with a pristine, sharp edge. The way it glides through food with little to no effort is a thing of beauty. So how do we keep our knives working like new after the honeymoon?

To really understand knife care, we need to understand what breaks down a knife's edge. There are three interactions in which a knife's edge is degraded:

The elements: Acids, water and detergents all react with steel and slowly break down its composition. The longer the steel is in contact with any of those things, the more degradation that occurs in the blade. Keeping a knife clean and dry will add years to its life and help retain a sharp edge.

Heat: Extreme heat can also break down a blade. Varying temperatures can slowly wear on a knife. Different materials expand and contract when exposed to different temperatures. This can easily rip handles away from tangs, and cause the knife to fall apart. Add liquid, and this is amplified even more.

Use: Let's face it— using a knife will dull its blade. How you use a knife has a big impact on how fast the edge degrades. If you're gentle while using it, you'll find the edge lasting longer. Also factor in your cutting board surface. Do not cut on a surface that is harder than steel. Wood is the most gentle on your knives. Glass and fiber will dull the knife quickly since both surfaces are harder than your knife's steel. Regardless, if you know how to sharpen a knife, you can restore the edge once it's gone. Now that we understand what factors dull your knife, let's talk about what we can do to preserve it.

Dishwasher a no-no: Keeping a clean knife is paramount to making your knife last, though the dishwasher hits all the points in what hurts your knife. It exposes the knife to water, detergent, heat, and with a strong enough spray, hard use. Instead, it's much easier to use warm water, a sponge with mild dish soap, and just gently rubbing the knife, washing off anything that could be stuck to it. Just keep your hand away from the edge, and dry immediately when done.

Sharpening: Sharpening removes worn down, softened steel to create a new edge from the harder steel below. There are different ways to accomplish this, but the best is to sharpen by hand with a series of decreasing grit factor whet stones. Grinding machines also sharpen, but tend to remove more steel than needed to produce a new edge, decreasing the lifespan of your knife. Using a honing steel after each use will lengthen the time needed between sharpening. Not sure how to hone a knife? Feel free to contact me or Nothing to It! for a quick and easy honing lesson. We also offer a full whet stone knife sharpening workshop and whet stone sharpening services.

Invest in a good knife: Knowing how your knife was constructed and the hardness/grade of steel that it is made of is paramount. Essentially, the harder the steel, the better it will hold its edge. Cheap, multi-knife sets are alluring at the warehouse club. However, those sets, even from well-known brands, are made with less expensive, softer steels that work great the first use and quickly dull. Make sure to ask questions when buying your knife, as some retailers and manufacturers will give you extra tips on how to keep your knife working like new. When in doubt, ask a professional. We're here to help!
